
Venus & Saturn

Two lights that only met in passing sight
With timing and distance aligned at night

On the Summer Solstice, we began
In an ordinary aisle, under fluorescent plan
Where nothing celestial was meant to land

Conversation flowing, unclaimed and free
I mistook proximity for clarity
And called it more than it could be

Your presence rearranged the air
Not as promise, but as flare
A brightness I began to wear

When you smiled, I filled in the rest
Wrote constellations across your chest
And called the guesswork something blessed

For Venus and Saturn do not touch
They only appear to, just enough

Ordinary Days

Hours surrender to days, days to years
Time never steals—it simply doesn't give back
So little seems to change until everything does
No tomorrow can reclaim what yesterday lacked

Some losses leave an empty chair
Others leave no visible scar
The cruelest ones keep breathing
Impossibly afar

We only measure time
After it has become memory
We never leave at once
We simply run out of ordinary days
