
Moonset

The moon, once blue, has faded from view
Yet traces of you remain in the morning dew
Time withdrew; something remained true

Familiar scents drift my way, collapsing years into yesterday
Mistaking warmth for home, strangers for remedies
Seeking relief from grief, finding only make-belief

For touch may soothe the blues, but cannot replace what we lose
Though passions burn bright, connections outlast the night
Pleasure may ease desire, yet never kindle the same fire

Ordinary days

Hours surrender to days, days to years
Time never steals—it simply doesn't give back
So little seems to change until everything does
No tomorrow can reclaim what yesterday lacked

Some losses leave an empty chair
Others leave no visible scar
The cruelest ones keep breathing
Impossibly afar

We only measure time
After it has become memory
We never leave at once
We simply run out of ordinary days

